John Dewey was an American psychologist and philosopher. "How We Think" is the dissected process/analysis of thinking/thought. In How We Think, Dewey shares his views on the educator's role in training students to think well. Basing his assertions on the belief that knowledge is strictly relative to human interaction with the world, he considers the need for thought training, its use of natural resources, and its place in school conditions; inductive and deductive reasoning, interpreting facts, and concrete and abstract thinking; the functions of activity, language, and observation in thought training; and many ...It is a work about epistemology, to be sure, but it surely can help open up some of the terms and concepts in his later works such as Experience and Education, if one reads and understands How We Think.
